An Experience to Remember . . .

Have you dreamed of going to Africa to photograph the animals who live there but always found the trip to be just a little out of reach? If so, you might want to consider the solution Buck and Malinda Lewis found.

Buck Lewis has wanted to go on safari for a long time, but, as a practicing attorney, he never found the time to go to Africa. When he read about Adam Jones's Wildlife Photography Workshops at the Triple D Game Farm in Kalispell, Montana, he realized that this just might be a way to get some great shots without the time commitment of a trip to Africa.

Buck and Malinda selected the summer workshop, held at the end of June. Also available is a winter version, scheduled in mid-January next year, if you don't mind average morning temperatures in the teens!

Should you elect to attend Adam's summer workshop, you'll gather at the ranch house each morning between 6 and 7 to begin the first of two daily photo sessions of about 1.5 h each, mixed in with classes led each day by Adam. The shooting location and activities depend on the size and characteristics of the animals. Buck was impressed with the care these animals receive at the Triple D. The handlers never forced an animal to come out or go back if it was unwilling.

Kalispell is just a half hour or so from Glacier National Park, and when the workshop is over, why not drive north to Banff and Jasper in the Canadian Rockies and take advantage of the gorgeous scenery there!

So if you are unable to travel to Africa for a safari, consider the Triple D Game Farm as an alternative. Lodging is available at the Holiday Inn in Kalispell. Buck says, "It was clean, inexpensive, and convenient, and I would highly recommend it. They have a discount for guests going to Triple D."

Read more about Adam's workshops on his website at www.adamjonesphoto.com under the Photo Tours heading. According to Buck and Malinda, you won't be disappointed!
